- 25
- full time worker
- new job
- recently started living with her partner
- Together with her partner for two years

“Sometimes I feel quite overwhelmed with all the additional interpersonal and planning things in our relationship in this new living situation.”

María Lebed has just gotten a new job and also recently started renting an apartment with her partner. They already know each other for a while but it is the first time she lives with somebody outside of her parents home. This however means that she's still getting used to not only having her own apartment, but also to share it with somebody and all of her new responsibilities.

She really loves her partner and naturally tries to care for him like asking how the day went or managing all the household utensils so they always have everything they need.

“I would like that my partner also takes responsibility for management and be responsive to me. He rarely asks how I'm doing.”

As a couple they are both quite happy with the split of the concrete household work: She likes to draw and generally prefers things to look more aesthetic and is willing to do the work for it. Thus she regularly cleans the home and puts misplaced things back at their respective places. In return, he is a pretty good cook and also tries to find more recipes that she might like.

But the hidden parts like planning is mainly done by María. She's also the one looking for their relationship by planning couple-time e.g. going out for dinner or listening mindfully when he had a bad day while he seems like not noticing it.
